Revolut Ramp Service Crypto Fees

This page sets out the fees that apply when you use RDAEL's Revolut Ramp service to buy or sell cryptoassets. It should be read together with the Revolut Ramp Terms.

The amount you pay or receive is made up of our exchange rate (which includes a spread — see below) and the fees set out on this page.

1.Network Fee

This is a fee paid to the blockchain, which we incur when sending cryptoassets to your Third Party Wallet on a purchase and Revolut passes this cost on to you for processing your transaction. For sales, we do not charge a network fee; any blockchain costs of sending cryptoassets from your Third Party Wallet to us is charged by your wallet provider or the network, not by us.

For purchases, the network fee is not shown to you as a separate item; it is included within the fee reflected in the total cost we show you.

The amount varies based on real-time network conditions, such as congestion and the time of day. The network fee shown in your quote is based on an estimate at the time you place your order and it is fixed once you confirm your order. If the quoted estimate is higher than the actual incurred fee, Revolut keeps the difference; if the quoted estimate is lower than the actual incurred fee, Revolut bears the loss.

2.Spread

Our exchange rate includes a "spread" — a variable cost built into the rate, which may sit above or below the mid-market price. The spread is part of the rate shown in your quote, not a separate charge. How we set our exchange rate is explained in the Revolut Ramp Terms.

3.Revolut Service Fee

This is an additional fee that Revolut charges for facilitating the crypto purchase or sale process. It is applied as a percentage of the volume traded, and varies according to:

- Amount traded
- Fiat currency used
- Crypto currency purchased or sold
- Which platform you are doing the ramping from

The figures shown before you confirm are indicative and move with the market. Once you confirm your order on the checkout screen, the service fee in your quote is fixed and is what you pay if your order is accepted. If a sale is cancelled and returned to you as a standard deposit, the service fee is waived and no spread is applied.

We will always show you a full quote, including the estimated network fee (for purchases only), the service fee and an exchange rate (inclusive of spread), before you confirm your purchase or sale on the checkout screen.
